CHAPTER XII. After sweing Constance down to the ladios cabin on board the boat at Southamption. Robert Harbut returned by the nine o'clock train to town: As he went up to town he thought over the incidents that had happened since Constance Corbyn come to England. Everything had rone i well-until-if -was-found-that the-loaf had been abstracted from the register. This at the time he had unhesitatingly put down as the work of Algernou Corbyn but he no longer felt sura had been made about a orson within a fortnight first. Who is the party who is looking for that?" of Mr. Corbyn's death, and that as Constance supposed she had been watched while in London, the aspect of the affair had changed, and it was quite probable that the first act of these mysterious opponents had been to obtain possession of the one absolute proof of the marriage. That James Ferris could know anything of the affair he re-arded as altogether out of the question. "I have a great—mind to—consult-him-on—the subject," he said to himself. "I suppose it would be a most unprofessional proceeding, but then the the wiereaboute of Morson." whole affair is unprofessional as far as I am cancerned, and I don't se anything else to do. Of course. I should not take such a stop with anyone else but Jim: but he is the soul of honour, and would never have put me into this thing unless everythin - had been perfectly straightforward. I can make neither head nor tail of it, and can see nothing to be done but to ask him if he can morrow evening, if he has no other engagement: me an bour at the ourliest time he can fix." The clock was just striking nine on the following evening when there was a knock at the outer door of Robert's chambers, for he had closed this lest any of his Temple friends might drop in. "Well, Bob, how are you?" James Ferris
